Marshall T. Morgan, M.D.
Chief of Medical Staff, UCLA Medical Center

“The design improvements and incorporation of new technologies in the new Ronald Reagan UCLA Medical Center will substantially boost efficiency and care quality. When we are talking about something as volatile as emergency medicine, even the smallest advancements and new technologies can make a big difference. We’re in the business of saving lives under urgent conditions – our new facility will help us succeed even more often.”

Dr. Marshall T. Morgan is chief of the medical staff at UCLA Medical Center and director of the Emergency Medicine Center in the David Geffen School of Medicine. He holds the rank of professor in the Department of Medicine. As chief of staff, he exercises oversight of the quality of physician practice and medical care in the medical center. As director of the Emergency Medicine Center, he oversees the emergency medicine practice group and the academic programs in emergency medicine.

Dr. Morgan received his M.D. from the Pritzker School of Medicine of the University of Chicago, and his postgraduate medical training at Harbor-UCLA Medical Center. He joined the faculty of the UCLA School of Medicine in 1974. He is a fellow of both the American College of Physicians and the American College of Emergency Physicians, and is a member of the Alpha Omega Alpha honor medical society.
